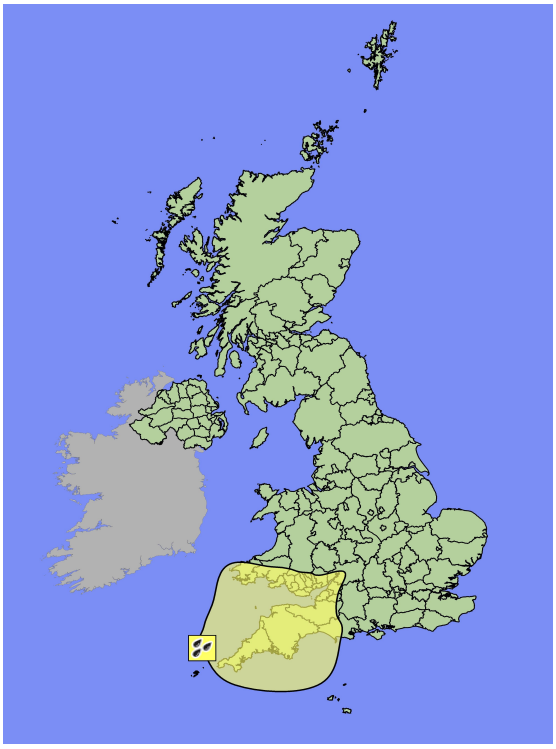
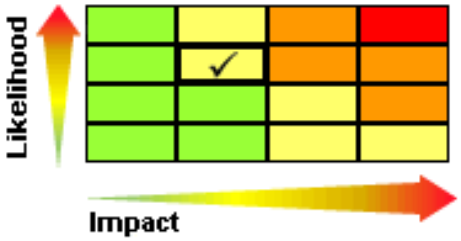
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
A deepening depression is expected to move towards the UK during Tuesday, pulling up warm, moisture laden air as it does so. On Wednesday this, potentially intense, depression will become slow moving to the southwest of England before gradually drifting northwards to lie over Ireland by the end of the day. There is still a good deal of uncertainty about amounts of rain and the strength of the wind, and this warning may well be revised over the coming days.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Alert of Rain

Valid from 00:05 on Wed, 17th Oct 2012 until 23:59 on Wed, 17th Oct 2012

The ground remains saturated, and with the threat of further heavy rain, the public are advised to be aware that localised flooding remains a risk on Wednesday.
